Waggle: www.waggle.org
As a 501(c)(3) not-for-profit organization, Waggle strives to ensure that the lives of family pets are not cut short because pet guardians lack the necessary funds to cover the cost of vital veterinary treatment. Waggle works in partnership with the general public, veterinary providers, rescues, and various animal welfare organizations to raise awareness for critical and urgent funding to save the lives of our four-legged best friends. Create a funding request for your pet at their website.

Financial Assistance: Other Options to Try

- Be upfront with your veterinarian about your financial restrictions.
- Discuss with your veterinarian the minimum treatment to save your animal's life. For example, purchasing a wheelchair for an animal can be more attainable than a full hip replacement. Your veterinarian can help you evaluate what is most helpful for your situation, keeping your animal's quality of life in mind.
- Ask other area clinics how much they normally charge for a similar treatment on a similar animal. Costs can vary widely from clinic to clinic.
- Offer to wash floors or do other labor at the veterinary clinic in exchange for lowering the treatment cost.
- Find a quick way to earn money, such as having a bake sale, yard sale, or car wash.
- Create a funding page using your social network site or other funding tool, like Go Fund Me (www.gofundme.com) or Chip In (www.chipin.com).
- Post fliers or collection jars with a description of the situation and a picture of the animal at local dog parks, vet clinics, pet stores, and other community gathering places.
- Contact church or community organizations you are connected with and explain your situation. They may be willing to help you fundraise or to raise awareness.
- Ask your family and friends for loans or to help spread the word about your situation.

- If the animal is purebred, contact that breed's enthusiast club in your area.
- Explain your situation to your landlord or mortgage company and try to arrange a payment option to free up rent money for veterinary treatment.
